CLAUDE MONET Water Lilies 1914-26

In this triptych, his representation of them can be seen to verge toward abstraction. In his designs for the Musée de l'Orangerie in Paris, he specified that the Water Lily canvases be displayed on curved walls. The aim of his large Water Lilies paintings, Monet said, was to supply "the illusion of an endless whole, of water without horizon or bank." This aim, he said, was to supply "the illusion of an endless whole, of water without horizon or bank." While his garden in Giverny studio in 1918, found "a dozen canvases placed in a circle on the floor a panorama made up of water and light, of light and sky. In that infinite, water and sky have neither beginning nor end." What this aim, he said, was to supply "the illusion of an endless whole, of water without horizon or bank." The Water Lilies Triptych comes from this series, which describes a scene Monet not only showed in art but shaped in life the pond in his own garden. Like his fellow Impressionists, Monet, when young, had attempted a fidelity to perceived reality, trying to capture the constantly changing quality of light and color. The Water Lilies, though, seem nearly abstract, for their scale and sheer splendor so immerse us in visual experience that spatial cues dissolve above and below.

near and flat, water and sky commanding. Perhaps this was the quality that Monet's visitors to say, "seem to be present at all of the first hours in the life of the world." Yet Monet desires that the installed create "the refuge of a peaceful meditation" as equally just.

These paintings are a vibration of Monet's own devotion to the effects of light. The result is as much a meditation in paint as a visual record of his own garden and pond.
